
"The children, who live a life more pure than ours, are divine workers; without pretensions, without pride, they accomplish humanity's magnum opus: the construction of man. And those who assist in this great work are enriched by the children's spiritual values and are elevated. The superiority and condescension evinced by adults towards the child crumble and, instead, a sense of humility emerges, the same sense that is evoked in him who succeeds in tearing the veil that hides the secrets of creation."
